It's one of the toughest law enforcement agencies in the nation: the Alaska State Troopers. They patrol the rugged terrain of America's largest state, whose fiercely independent citizens don't often regard the cops as their friends and helpers... The roughly 400 officers often travel hundreds of miles in piercing subzero temperatures. Responding by land, air and sea – with backup sometimes days away – they face countless dangers in order to protect the people and wildlife of Alaska.

In Season II of "Alaska State Troopers," the National Geographic Channel's daredevil film team again spends several exciting months with the Troopers, both those who police the towns and villages, and those who enforce fish and game regulations. The episodes continue to reflect the many facets of life and law enforcement in Alaska. Cameras accompany the Troopers as they chase down suspects and respond to gun calls in the dark of night. From embarking on a foot pursuit through the snowy woods to monitoring an underground fight club in one of the remotest villages, no job is too big or too small for Alaska's frontier force.

We are there when the Troopers patrol the epic Iditarod dog sled race, cross frozen tundra to rescue an injured snow-machiner, and trek through bear-infested forests to regulate bait stations. With only a handful of cops, the troopers attempt to keep the peace among 12,000 partiers in a beer tent at the 25th annual Arctic Man.

In other episodes, the Police Department of the most populous and crime-ridden city in Alaska – Anchorage – joins the Troopers in their efforts to catch Alaska's most hardened criminals. The challenges an Alaska State Trooper faces are diverse, but one thing is sure – these are not your average cops.
